INTRODUCTION

Probably more has been written about reading and reading failure than about any other school subject. Literally hundreds of books and thousands of articles are available to the teacher, attempting to explain why children fail in reading and what to do about it. Most of these present somewhat diverse opinions relative to the causes of retardation and to the ways in which it should be overcome.

Regardless of the controversies about causes and methods of correction, most educators agree that children who are retarded readers learn more rapidly when they are supplied with materials which interest them. Children wish to read about the same things that other children of their age read about whether or not they are retarded. Because of this, many teachers frequently ask where they might secure books with stories and information which would interest older children, but which would be written in simple words that these children might read.

This publication on high interest, low vocabulary books has been prepared to meet a widespread need. It includes lists of 2,129 titles. Although an effort has been made to include all books currently available, there are doubtless many good books which are not included. Such oversights are unintentional. Persons who use this list are invited to inform the State Department of Education of books which they know have been overlooked. These may be, from time to time, placed on a supplementary list.

It is hoped that a great many teachers will find materials in this publication which will be of benefit to children who are having difficulty reading at their grade level whether the reason lies in emotional difficulties, language difficulties, or retarded mental development.
